Dr. Tunstall, “a thorough and enthusiastic Scotsman,” spent most of his professional life in Vancouver, but he also provided care to “a large number of men” while in Kamloops, BC, during the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He also served as President of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia and was a director of the Vancouver General Hospital. When he died in 1917, CMAJ wrote: “He always took a keen interest in professional and public affairs, and was popular with colleagues and patients alike.”
